Lancaster names new clinic manager Lancaster Family Health Center welcomes Amanda Hill

SALEM— An Oregon native is advancing her career. Recently graduated an administrative fellowship, Amanda Hill will continue her path to a career in health care administration with Yakima Valley Farm Workers Clinic, locally known as Lancaster Family Health Center, with two locations in Salem. She will continue with the organization as the location’s clinic manager.

She completed her undergraduate degree at Western Oregon University and finished her masters while working fulltime at Salud Medical Center in Woodburn as an administrative assistant and finished the Sollus Northwest Administrative Fellowship earlier this year.

“I have witnessed the profound impacts our clinics have on our communities. Our clinics offer services to patients who may otherwise not have access to care,” she said. “I’m so excited to put to use the skills and knowledge I gained from this fellowship to continue serving my neighbors.”

The Sollus Northwest Administrative Fellowship program is a postgraduate fellowship that fosters the development of individuals committed to the patient population of federally qualified community health centers, and to careers in health care administration. This fellowship has three key components: orientation, project-based training, and community service.

The goal of the program is that fellows will gain a greater understanding of the unique dynamics of a Community Health Center, develop, and prepare the next generation of leaders at Yakima Valley Farm Workers Clinic.
